This one-day CME course is meant to provide a practical review of Head and Neck Imaging with a particular view to community radiologists seeking to deploy practical techniques after taking the course.

The material is geared towards the practicing community radiologist who does some head and neck imaging as part of their practice. Emphasis will be placed on radiologic head and neck anatomy and cover more commonly encountered topics such as sinus/FESS imaging, thyroid disease and the basics of oncologic imaging of the pharynx, oral cavity and larynx. The presentations will place emphasis on modalities such as CT, MRI and nuclear medicine.

Two interactive sessions will also be included in the day's schedule focussing on a cross-section of approximately 40 cases. These will be clinical imaging case review sessions that will highlight specific teaching points and clinical and imaging pearls.

Otolaryngology and radiation oncology colleagues will also be presenting at this CME. These presentations will offer a clinician's perspective of the various topics and give their radiology colleagues insight into "what it is the clinician needs to know" from the imaging and imaging reports.

At the conclusion, the goal is to have provided a solid review of some of the more commonly encountered entities in head and neck disease and leave the attendee with knowledge and insight that can be applied in their practice.

Workstations will be available in exhibit rooms for attendees to review other related head and neck cases as well as an opportunity to speak to lecturers one-on-one.
